The breeding goal, or breeding objective, is the starting point of animal breeding. Broadly speaking, the breeding goal is the direction in which we want to improve the population. The choice of the breeding goal affects the structure of breeding programs. Broiler (chicken for meat) breeding programs for example differ from layer (chicken for egg production) breeding programs because improvement of egg production requires another breeding program than improvement of meat production.

The breeding goal has a number of characteristics.

1. The breeding goal is a combination of traits. It specifies the relative importance of each trait. In principle, all traits of importance should be included in the breeding goal. Thus the breeding goal only depends on the importance of a trait, not on its genetic parameters. An important trait of low heritability should be included in the breeding goal, whereas unimportant traits should be left out, irrespective of their heritability.
2. The breeding goal should aim at the future. Animal breeding is a long-term activity. It takes a long time before genetic improvement due to selection is expressed in the production population.
3. From an operational point of view, the breeding goal should ideally summarize all traits in a single criterion. A single criterion to express the quality of selection candidates is convenient because animal breeders can simply rank their selection candidates on this value and select the highest-ranking individuals. A breeding goal expressed as a single value can be obtained by weighting all traits by an (economic) factor, so that the breeding goal is a sum of breeding values weighted by their (economic) value.

Questions should be raised in developing breeding programs are like:

- ❖ what market the breeding goal is aimed at;
- ❖ whether the breeding goal should be based on the competitive position of the breeding company or on an economic model of the production herds
- ❖ Existence of political or market circumstances such as production quota that affect the breeding goal.
